“ I didn't think grandad was a very complicated man. And it was in his simplicity that he shone for me. It might sound stupid, but knowing that grandad could sit still, drink a glass, and not worry about tomorrow allowed me not worry about tomorrow. Any time I talked with him, told him a problem, sought advice, he had a tip or two but the take-away was always the same. Don't worry. You'll be fine champ. He showed me that life will be okay without worrying too much. And that we could sit and enjoy this beautiful life and didn't need to fret.

I remember when we were in Hawaii, and grandad didn't agree with the drinking age, he slipped us some of his whiskey. We were all kicked out, including dad and his soon-to-be bride. And afterwards, grandad still gave off the calming feeling he always did. That's how I'll remember him. Like a rock in the waves. A point of calm in a shifting ocean. And I can never thank him enough for being that way. Because floating through life is scary sometimes. Sometimes everything moves too fast and you feel lost in the immensity. And so if you ever meet someone lost, remember, sometimes all they need is to see a rock, and that's enough.

You weren't a complicated man. You were a rock. And it was enough.

“ It has been an honor and a privilege to have known Brian. He was kind, wise and most of all respected. He never seemed to mind sharing his knowledge (or his scotch) with anyone. Brian was dedicated to his family and the real-life love story he shared with Isabel was truly beautiful. I am truly blessed to have known him.
